Dear Ms. Hesse:

It is no secret that one of the reasons that Microsoft has succeeded is that the federal government has had very little control over the technology industry. Over-regulating this industry will slow progress.

Technology has fueled the current economic expansion and we should be looking to preserve its status rather than take it down. As a regular consumer of high technology products, I enjoy the benefits of a free and competitive market - prices are affordable, the products are of high quality, and the rate of development is the fastest of any market in the world.

There is now an agreement between the opposing parties in this case that designates a fair system of checks and balances. Additionally, it sets out a plan to monitor future activities and a technology committee to enforce them.

Resolving this case once and for all is not only beneficial to the courts and all participants, but also to the marketplace. I hope you will accept this fair agreement.

Sincerely,

David Cechota
